habits: the men sat on chairs or if on the ground they were invariably wearing shoes or boots disturbing to the old habits. [177]

Women folded their arms with the palms of the hands flat against the breast under the biceps, fingers extended.

There were characteristic ways a seated person wrapped his robe about him. The robe, thrown over the back, was wrapped over the front, drawn well up under the chin, and the upper right hand corner thrown back over the left shoulder. I saw a number of men and women sitting with their blankets protecting the front of the body, not the back: they were drawn up under the chin, the corners thrown back over the shoulders.

After drinking they wiped the mouth with the heel of the hand. [264]

They shook hands by laying their palms together, not grasping hands, and merely moving them up and down once. At the same time, they uttered the proper kinship term and nothing more, as "My nephew." To a friend the greeting was mataxavi'k, "my best friend" (lit. "we two" [?]) or more commonly perhaps, kiyi', "friend" (when one of the speakers was a woman, the form was ciyi'). Even a left-handed man shook hands with his right hand. To use the left hand was to imply some deceit. No reason was assigned for left-handedness (kusa'rŏk). The left hand was called cŏlkwĭsa'rŏk (cŏl, "hand"); the right hand cŏlgâxa'n, "good hand."

Men meeting on the road would greet each other with ki'lmiyăm mo', "Where are you going?" A man would greet a woman on the road as freely and in the same terms.

Etiquette on approaching a house was prescribed. The visitor did not go in directly. He would sit or stand by the door until the occupant said, "Come in (kâxa'vŏk)." As he sat down they always said, "Go ahead: help yourself to what [food] I have (kâxa'vŏk kâwi'm)," or the host would say, "Sit down while I get something for you to eat." The host would not wait to hear the visitor's errand before feeding him. They proceeded quite leisurely, smoking together, waiting until the visitor chose to unburden himself. He was never asked directly why he came. The host would ask how the visitor's people were and he would in 574 576 turn inquire how the host was feeling. An infrequent visitor might tell of the death of a relative, when the host would cry with him in sympathy. (But there was no formal tear salutation such as Russell describes for the Pima.[17]) If a visitor was met outside the house, he was greeted, "Spread your news [gânavŏk, 'talk!']!" If only women were at home, they would invite the guest to eat but would not question him. On leaving, a visitor says, "I came to see you and find your people are well. I feel good to see them well: I am happy. I spent the day well. I am [201] going home now." They shook hands on parting, calling each other again by kinship terms with not another word. (I saw this performance repeatedly and was impressed with the extreme parsimony of the exchange of salutations.)

482 Carrying habits followed sex-differentiated patterns. A woman invariably carried burdens balanced on her head, usually supported on a ring-shaped pad of cloth. In this fashion, they carried pots of water, baskets of mesquite, or the cradle, the last even perched on top of a basket loaded beyond its brim. On the other hand, a man never carried anything on his head: a log, for instance, rested on the shoulder.[18] Women also carried articles at the small of the back in a cloth tied around the waist, in the fash- [171] ion of the Pueblos and Havasupai, but men never did so. On journeys a man carried water in a gourd tied to the left side of the belt by a cord tied around its neck, the gourd stoppered with a corn cob. When a man and woman travelled together, "he let her carry everything." Women were, in fact, adept carriers. The carrying net of southern California and the netted frame of the Pima and Papago were unknown.

532 They never hesitated to draw diagrams on the ground for me and were not concerned to wipe them away, unlike the Havasupai.

572 A special relation of friendship sometimes united men. "They

[18] Curiously enough, Garcés' Halchidhoma travelling companion of 1774, who had both hands occupied, carried a jug of water on his head (Bolton, Anza's California Expeditions, II, 387).
